Message from Project & Operations Managers

First of all, because the highest value is always a human being, his life and health. Neither the size of wages, nor the level of profitability of the enterprise, nor the value of the product produced can serve as a basis for disregarding safety rules and justifying existing threats to the life or health of employees. Moreover, it is also about the value of the individual as an employee with his or her inherent knowledge, skills and experience. Properly organized work to ensure occupational safety increases employee discipline, which, in turn, leads to increased productivity, reducing the number of accidents, equipment breakdowns and other abnormal situations, that is, ultimately increases the efficiency of production.
